THURSDAY EVENING, JAN. 8, 1880.

Joseph Cook's Monday Lectures.
Rev. T. G. Apple, D. D., in the Messenger.
They are still going on, and so far as we can see, they may continue to go on indefinitely. Our interest in them has long since begun to weaken and flag. They bring forward very little new after the first course.
It has become very evident that he has nothing original to present as a system of thought, but that he is content with culling and compiling. He has used a liberal hand especially the best results of German thought. He has a vivid imagination and generally resists his argument on a striking simile. But one grows tired of this method when continually repeated. His dramatic attitude in summoning characters before him and questioning them begins to grow insipid. There is too much of it. A considerable portion of his last lecture consists in picturing a reef of solid land, such as that on which New York is built, and insisting, over and over again, that he is planted on an immovable foundation nonwithstanding that the deep waters lash it on either side. Then we grow weary of his repetitious paragraphs numbered on almost indefinitely, as though each one so profound that it must stand as a thesis by itself. One or two good thoughts ought to be enough to float a lecture. We long for some one idea which, in its development, might gather thoughts around it in some organic relation. But here we have proposition after proposition going on until we reach the thirtieth, and we wonder why they did not stop at the twenty-ninth, or go on to the thirty-first. We see no reason why they should stop just at the thirtieth, and we wonder most of all, that they are so strong and far-reaching as he claims for each one, why three or four, or at most a half dozen, would not be better than thirty. It seems to show a spreading of things out of thought without much depth. So the external form of these lectures strikes us. The language is so intense that one is tempted to think this is designed to compensate for the lack of intensity of thought. We feel Mr. Cook is a great gatherer of thoughts, but he is deficient in the power of condensing his thoughts, and that he is now marshalling out the old soldiers in new lines. His courses of lectures do not stand in a system, and we, therefore, can see no verging towards a final end. They may go on indefinitely. We would like to see his last
